

THE NEW YORK TIMES,
THURSDAY, APRIL 28, 1955.

About Art and Artists

Another persuasive outdoor painter is Maurice Sievan, whose recent work is at the Passedoit Gallery, 121 East Fifty-seventh Street. He is an impressionist after his own fashion, painting open and wooded country in a flurry of brushstrokes that approximate the forms they represent. Color, mostly a range of dull greens and blues, is reticent. Were design more emphatic, these pictures would make a sharper impression.

NEW YORK HERALD TRIBUNE.
SATURDAY, APRIL 30, 1955

Art Exhibition Notes

Sievan at Passedoit

The forest as subject of artists is often pictured with more sense of the individual trees than of whole woods. Maurice Sievan, a good painting impressionist, hasn't found the problem of generalizing this subject too difficult, but on the contrary is fluent in the extreme in developing abstract form in it. A number of his pictures of woodland thickets at the Passedoit Gallery are rather cursory and self-conscious, but his art reveals now a fresh approach and the cool tonality he achieves is harmonious and restful.

CHARLES Z. OFFIN, Editor-in-Chief

MAY, 1955

* * *

MAURICE SIEVAN's expertly edited show at the Passedoit Gallery proves that he can do sensitive, delicate, almost pastel-like and yet highly dramatic and truly individual work when he is not dashing his paintings off in an impetuous fashion. Woodland Forest, with its lacy pattern of branches; Provincetown Sands, a dark, ominous setting; The Orchard, representing a few scattered, twisted trees that seem to have lives of their own; Esopus Creek, a mysterious vista — are far more evocative than the few unsubstantial sketches.

R. F.

* * *