

In the Art Galleries...

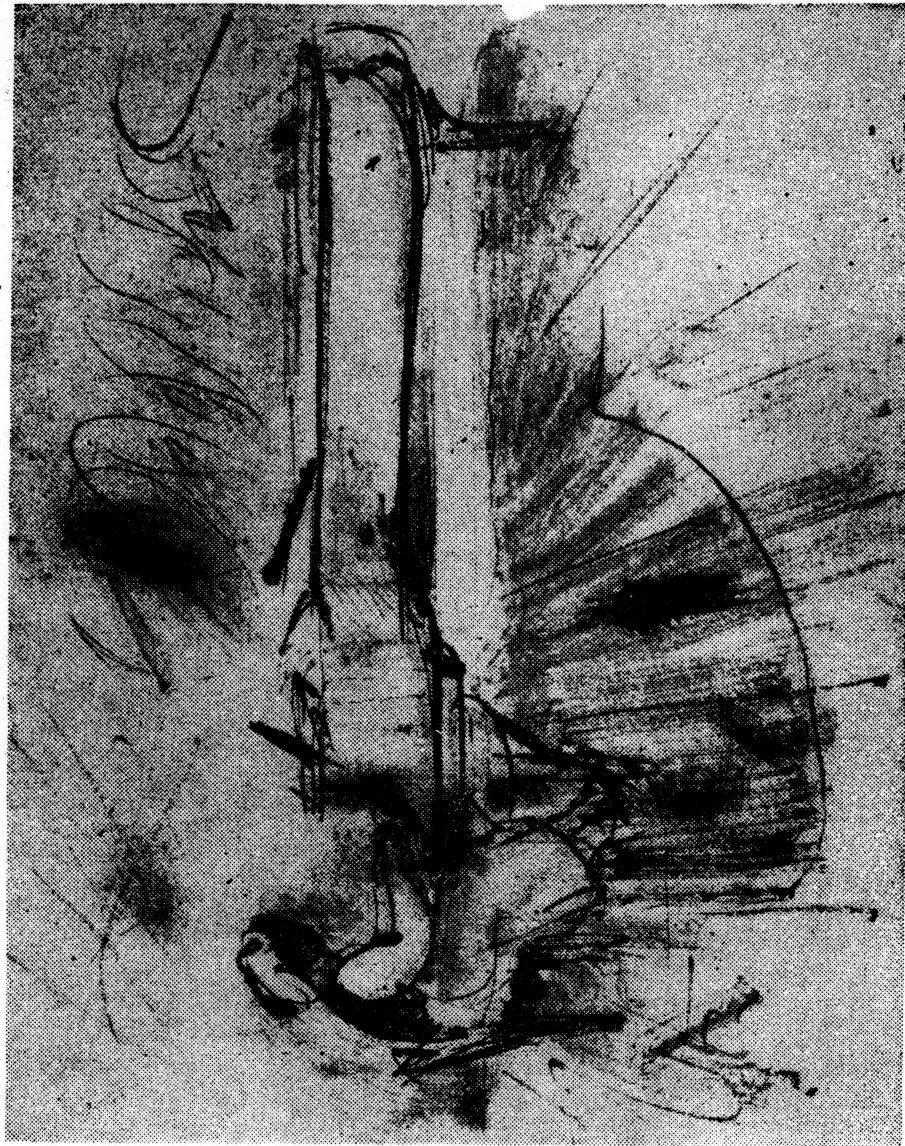

NEW YORK POST, SUNDAY, JUNE 26, 1955

By CHARLES L. MULLIGAN

The artist who painted the accompanying fantasy on a concert grand piano of awesome length calls it a Drawing in Oils. It could be a variation on The Lost Chord. There is no identification of the plump and pleasing person seated enraptured at the keyboard.

The painting, by Maurice Sievan, is on view at the Rudolph Galleries at Woodstock, in the Catskills, following a one-man show at the Passedoit Gallery in New York. Also being shown are Sievan's landscape, and the gallery quotes Joseph Solman, painter and writer on art, as saying: "His work at first glance seems fugitive. The visitor looking for fireworks will always miss him. But once his canvas is noted one has a desire to linger over the unusual harmonies, to discover that streak of nature that Sievan has burrowed so patiently out of the suburban strata."

* * *

The Impromptu, a Drawing in Oils, by Maurice Sievan, at Rudolph Galleries, Woodstock.